

Bon City Video Explanation Essay

by Jazmin Cordon

The Bon City story with Gremlins can seem pretty farfetched. This is mainly because the change in the story starts with made-up creatures who come out of caves to help humans and the Earth. However, using fictitious creatures is an essential aspect of imagining a future that doesn't exist yet. This story is trying to bring across the point of working together with people who are different from yourself. When people can put their differences aside and work towards impactful goals with others, it creates real change. In the story, the majority of humans do the complete opposite of this. At first, they push away the Gremlins because they are so different.

When the Gremlins worked with solar technology, they wanted to improve the outdated solar that the humans were using. You can see in the animation that the human kid and a Gremlin worked cooperatively on solar farms. Solar was a start to bringing communities together to solve humanity's problems. The humans were still clinging to their old ways, even after seeing the changes that can happen on Earth. This is the reason humans wanted the Gremlins to leave. Soon after this, they realize their mistake and made the deal to share the Earth. This decision adversely affects many people, including factory owners and politicians.

They might not want to sacrifice their way of being because of wanting to stay comfortable, profit, and status - even if it's for the greater good of humanity. But progress was made despite the pushback because more of the "common" people understood that the change would create a positive impact on humans and the entire Earth. The message to take care of the Earth together is one that I feel everyone should hear, heed, and act upon.
